

WORKPLACE LAW

Students who earn the certificate for this concentration learn about the regulation of the employment relationship in the United States. Topics addressed include the employment at will doctrine, employment discrimination law, labor relations law, wage-hour law, employee privacy rights, and administrative law.

Workplace law is a dynamic and challenging field that deals with contemporary social issues. For example, in recent years, significant workplace issues have arisen from the #metoo movement, the COVID-19 pandemic and work-from-home/return-to-work policies, and the increase in union organizing activities.

Those who specialize in this field often work either for a government agency, corporation, labor union, or in private practice, representing employers, employees, or unions.

A substantial component of workplace law involves settling disputes, and Quinnipiac is uniquely positioned to ensure that you have a competitive advantage in that area. Our Center on Dispute Resolution's training and its Quinnipiac/Yale Workshop on Dispute Resolution are valuable assets for our students. The center holds workshops, sponsors prominent speaking events on campus, and offers opportunities to train with lawyers in the field. You can also gain practical experience participating in national and regional mock trial and dispute resolution competitions.

In our Civil Justice Clinic, you'll have opportunities to represent real clients with cases relating to unemployment and unpaid wages. And in our employment and labor externship program, you'll perform the work that workplace lawyers do, whether you choose a law firm, a government agency, or work in-house at a corporation. Because this concentration offers a wide variety of courses, you can individualize your experience and focus on a specific area in workplace law that interests you, such as mediation and arbitration, discrimination law, or workers' compensation.
